What I mean is that it was not a tax haven by design, but the government simply never introduced personal income taxes. This has changed in recent years, but the good news is that as a resident without local income, you do not have to pay paraguay taxes, and no one will bother you. There is simply no culture of tax evasion in Paraguay. After years of deferral, personal income tax at a rate of 10% was finally introduced in 2012. This tax seems more of a badge measure than anything else, it's directed at Paraguay's upper classes, which, in any case, could structure their affairs to avoid payment. The tax does not apply to worldwide income – it applies only to income from Paraguay. For example, if you own a property in Paraguay and receive rental income, or if you receive a salary from a local company, you have to pay income tax. But if you live in Paraguay on income earned outside the country, you are exempt from income tax and are not obliged to file back. Many pensioners or Internet-based workers use it, as well as the low cost of living, to enjoy life in Paraguay. Europeans, Canadians and indeed everyone who is not in the US, a citizen who is a tax resident in Paraguay, so it is a great offer. Unfortunately, the United States requires its citizens to pay taxes on their incomes all over the world, even if they do not live there. The only way for Americans in Paraguay to avoid tax net is to acquire second citizenship and renounce their American citizenship. Other taxes are relatively low in Paraguay. VAT is also 10%, property tax is between 0.5% and 1% of cadastral value per year, capital gains tax is 10% (20% of 50% gross) for non-residents and no property or inheritance taxes. All bond yields in Paraguay do not pay income tax, although dividends are taxed at 5%. Mortgage interest deductions and tax deductions for homeowners are less takers these days. Here's what to know.
